College president named to nonprofit board

Dayton Business Journal

John Garland, president of Central State University, has been appointed to the Edison Materials Technology Center's Governing Board, effective immediately.

Garland has experience in the military, law and higher education fields. His experience in the higher education fields includes positions at the University of the District of Columbia and the University of Virginia. He has been president of Central State for the past 10 years.

"John Garland has long been a strong proponent of technology growth as evidenced from his prior work with EMTEC and his ongoing support for Central State's business incubator," said Frank Svet, EMTEC president and chief executive officer. "EMTEC views the appointment of Garland as further indication of our interest in continually looking for ways to strengthen technology collaboration opportunities for all and working with Ohio's college/university system."

Garland is filling an open board position that was voted on at the December meeting.

EMTEC is a Kettering-based nonprofit that develops business and technology strategies through collaborative projects to help get new technology to market.
