EMTEC exec promoted to new-products job

Staff Report

Tuesday, March 18, 2008

KETTERING — Jon VanDonkelaar, an executive at the Edison Materials Technology Center, has been promoted to a new job in which he will help companies and universities find product development opportunities in the advanced energy field.

VanDonkelaar is occupying the new job of vice president for product development, a new position at EMTEC.

He has served for the past three years as the organization's director of the PDQ Center for Accelerated New Product Development, and is also an adjunct professor in the University of Dayton's engineering department. He previously held various engineering jobs in private industry.

EMTEC is a state-assisted, nonprofit organization that helps companies develop new materials technologies and get them to market.
